breaking news alerts and special reports. The news and stories that matter, delivered weekday mornings. The Food and Drug Administration is about to propose a sweeping overhaul of how it regulates blood safety, which could mean expanded screening, new tests and more regulated donor checks. Let our news meet your inbox. The news and stories that matters, delivered weekday mornings. This site is protected by recaptcha For years, public health experts have said blood safety is a public health crisis, with far too many blood donations being wasted on ineligible people and too many getting dangerously infected through transfusions. Experts say all the evidence indicates that the only way to really make blood safe is to require all donations to be screened, to have new rules about when to test, and to do more to prevent the infection of new donors. "There is no other product on earth that has this much public health impact as blood," said Dr. Luciana Borio, deputy director of the FDA's Center for Biologics Evaluation and Research. Borio spoke to reporters on Tuesday at a press briefing, but the new policy is expected to be finalized within days. According to sources briefed on the plan, it would change how the FDA regulates blood safety and is part of its overall plan to make sure "biologics products like blood" are as safe as possible. It's expected to be a big overhaul of the FDA's blood safety system. It includes some of the biggest changes since 1981, when Congress passed the first laws regulating blood safety. They include: An increase in the number of blood donations allowed. There would
